In the slums there is no concealment of the ravages of poverty. Gaunt men and women, hoping vainly for work, are unable to provide for still more feeble children, beset by the diseases that come with hunger. Without fuel or fire or food they are living as best they can. It was an army of such desperate people, fully 30,000, that broke boldly through the lines of guards and in one day carried away an entire forest just outside the city. The guards, themselves hun-gry, could not find the heart to stop the lines of people that broke through. dragging branches and stumps of the

It was a hopeless task, the Americans decided, to feed all of the des-titute, but to every hospital which was filled with the victims of hunger was given medical aid and the food that would help to rebuild the pa-tients. Aid was given only to concerns where Austrian officials them-selves were found to be doing their utmost with their small resources. Likewise, in the distribution of cloth-ing and other relief material it was supplied through the Austrian organ-izations that were helping themselves. Under the system established by Major Robert Davis, of Englewood, N. J., the relief of Vienna is steadily progressing while but a mere handful of Americans have been required to handle the situation. In the meantime, a harvest is coming on and the great city has been enabled to exist by being helped in its own desperate efforts by the few necessities the Americans had to give.
